II. PRESENTATION

AN OVERVIEW OF THE ROLE OF THE CLINICAL WELLNESS ADVOCATES (CWA) IN TRI-CITY'S SYSTEM OF CARE

Janet Lewis, Program Supervisor (Clinical Wellness Advocate Program), introduced herself and stated that Clinical Wellness Advocates (CWA) are individuals, or have close family members, who have experienced life altering experiences of mental illness or/and substance abuse, and have since recovered and are now able to support others in their recovery.

She then discussed the number of staff that are part of the CWA program; the reasons for client referrals which are as a result of missing multiple appointments, lack of engagement in treatment, substance use, financial barriers, poor self-care, or poor engaging families; mentioned the places where the CWAs provide assistance to clients such as in the office community, Wellness Center, treatment facilities, homes, shelters, court rooms, parks, or street corners. She explained that the CWAs approach is informal and they initiate and develop relationships, share recovery stories, work in inspiring hope and trust, and spend time with clients. She pointed out that when using this approach, the CWA's show clients that there are several pathways to recovery; support client with one-to-one meetings and during meetings of any type; and provide extra emotional support and understanding.

Jeri Sprewell, Clinical Wellness Advocate, talked about her lived experience, her role and the support she provides through her position as CWA; and commented that when she introduces herself, she indicates that she is a peer and someone who has been where the client is today. She also explained that the CWA provides support such as assisting with coordinating medical appointments, provide transportation to appointments and sit in appointments, facilitating communication with community resources; and engaging and supporting client in maintaining communication with others.

Commissioner Villanueva commented about his lived experienced and then inquired about the percentage of Tri-City clients with mental disorders that have developed by long term substance abuse. Director of Clinical Program Services Owens indicated that approximately 46% of Tri-City clients have a dual diagnosis.

At 3:45 p.m., Governing Board Liaison Rubio R. Gonzalez and Commissioner Elmer Vidaña arrived at the meeting.

Discussion ensued regarding services provided to parolees' population; how realignment funds are used to provide services; and about current efforts of Tri-City to integrate services for mental and substance abuse disorders.

Commissioner Villanueva commented reading a book titled 'In the Realm of Hungry Ghosts' and recommended that staff read this book; he also praised CWA Sprewell for helping clients with love and compassion.

Commissioner Bloom inquired when the Clinical Wellness Advocate program had begun. Director of Clinical Program Services Owens explained that this program was a re-start from another similar program that was called 'Advocates' which was introduced approximately six years ago; however, it was not effective due to how the program was structured. Therefore, the program was reintroduced last year as a result of the need for additional support, noting that this time there was a different program foundation and that, with the assistance of key personnel, a very specific job description was developed for the Clinical Wellness Advocate position.

Discussion ensued regarding the difference between the original Advocate program and the existing Clinical Wellness Advocate program; the current challenges in meeting the needs of all client referrals with the existing personnel; the pending need of additional personnel to meet the needs of all of the referrals; and the established requirements for the Clinical Wellness Advocate position which includes having lived experience among several other requirements.

Commissioner Stephens commented on the importance of recognizing the little steps to recovery and praised staff for recognizing the 'gains' which in her opinion are successes.

The Mental Health Commission thanked staff for their presentation.
